The top window in the chart above is the NYSE McClellan Summation index. When this index reaches above +500 (today's close was +554), it is implied the market has reached "escape velocity" and a new uptrend has started. There can be corrections that follow but overall higher prices are expected and an intermediate term bullish sign. Follow us on twitter. @OrdOracle

Yesterday's low tested last Thursday's low on higher volume and suggests yesterday's low will at least be tested again and could go lower. Today high tested yesterday's gap on lighter volume and suggests the gap has resistance. With yesterday's low testing last Thursday low and today gap test on lighter volume suggests tomorrow's FOMC meeting announcement day will be a down day. How much down we don't know but it could test the December 10 low near 257 SPY range. The last seven announcements by Chairman Powell were down; will number eight be down also? The equity Put/Call ratio closed yesterday at .76 which suggests a higher market within 5 days out of being higher 88% of the time with average gain of 1.3%. For a bullish setup is for the TRIN to close greater than 1.30 and the Ticks close less than -300 and be near the December 10 low. Bigger picture is bullish and waiting for a setup short term. FOMC meeting is today and tomorrow with the announcement at 2:00 Wednesday. Above is the monthly chart of GDX. The month of January ends Thursday (two days away). A monthly RSI close above 50 (current reading is 51.93) is a bullish longer term signal. The middle window is the monthly GDX with the moving averages of 3, 9, and 11. When all three cross ( in this case cross to the upside) a bullish longer term signal is triggered. A close below 20.50 could change these bullish signals back to neutral on Thursday. GDX has been up five months in a roll (strength follows Strength) and suggests further strength to come. If market pulls back to 20.50 on Thursday than will have to reconsider bullish picture. Long GDX on 1/29/19 at 21.97.
